The gemstone is so rare that it has left even the coveted diamond behind

The versatile tourmaline comes in a rainbow of hues and colours. But amongst them, one exotic newcomer stands out — the Paraiba tourmaline. Discovered in the 1980s, this mint-green wonder has all the shades of a clear ocean, ranging from blue to green in extraordinary vivid hues as if glowing with a unique fire within.

Miner Heitor Dimas Barbosa spent years digging at the now famous Paraiba Hill (Mina da Batalha) in the federal Brazilian State of Paraiba, confident that he will one day find something extraordinary under that hill. The search began in 1981, and after many a failed attempts for over five years, traces of this rare gem began to appear. Finally, in the autumn of 1989, a handful of Paraiba tourmalines saw daylight. The luminous Paraiba tourmaline, scientifically known as cuprian elbaite, quickly became one of the most sought-after gemstones in the world. It appears in a range of coveted colours — greenish blue, bluish green, green, blue, and violet hues.

A gemstone so rare that it has left even the coveted diamond behind, one Paraiba tourmaline is mined for every 10,000 diamonds. A combination of good quality, colour and size is an even rare occurrence. Its rarity and extraordinary colour have sent the market into a frenzy. From a few hundred dollars per carat, its value rose to thousands of dollars per carat within days of discovery. Today, achieving five-digit figures is not unusual; and the demand still keeps increasing.

Discovered in the 1980s, Paraiba tourmaline has all the shades of a clear ocean, from blue to green

Although this cerulean beauty is at its best after cutting and polishing, the high value of the rough usually calls for exceptional designs and custom cuts. It is mostly faceted into brilliant cuts, commonly pear and oval shapes. Paraiba tourmalines larger than five carats are rarely seen. But with this gemstone, colour is key, not size.

Brazil is home to almost all tourmalines, but a radiant turquoise was always lacking in the shade card. Paraiba tourmaline filled that gap, owing its splendid colour to copper, an element which has never been observed in a tourmaline before. The vibrant colour of Paraiba tourmaline is so fascinating that it has often been called with names like swimming-pool-blue, aqua blue, sky blue, neon, electric, mint green and many more. Its beauty, though, is never dependent on light, as it looks as good in low light as it does in the day. The allure of this gemstone and its low supply have left jewellers and celebrities across the globe hungry for more. Each new supply is eagerly awaited, snatched up within days, and worked upon for months, resulting in creations that mesmerise jewellery connoisseurs around the world.

With such a scarce supply from the Paraiba Hill, the world had started to wonder how to get their hands on more of this aqua wonder. But as it turned out, nature did have another surprise up its sleeve. In early 2001, another batch of Paraiba tourmalines was discovered in Africa. These Nigerian beauties are similar to the tourmalines in their colour and luminosity. Re-enforcing the continental drift theory, more of these copper-bearing tourmalines were found in Mozambique in 2005, which brought good news to gem dealers as the Mozambique version was much clearer and found in larger sizes. Wherever the source maybe, the world is more than happy to have more of these new-found beauties. 💎
